It is constantly present in the atmosphere, but in very small amount. It is a colorless gas of peculiar odor, and, chemically, consists of oxygen so condensed that 3 atoms of the element occupy a molecule instead of two, as in ordinary oxygen gas. A long, reddish, acinuous tubular gland running transversely behind the stomach, about opposite the first lumbar vertebra. Its right and larger extremity, the head, lies in the curvature of the duodenum, while the left and smaller, the tail, is in contact with the spleen. Its anterior surface is covered by the stomach, its posterior is separated from the vertebral column by the aorta, the superior mesenteric vessels, and the pillars of the diaphragm, and the inferior surface rests upon the junction of the duodenum and jejunum, and on the left end of the transverse colon. It consists of a somewhat loose aggregation of lobes and lobules, which empty by canals into a central duct (the canal of Wirsung) which traverses the entire length of the gland a little nearer the upper than the lower border. According to Bernard and others, the human p., as also that of many animals, has normally two ducts, the main duct and the duct of Wirsung, opening into the intestine near or in conjunction with the bile duct, and the lesser, or duct of Santorini, opening independently. [J. 28.] It secretes the pancreatic fluid, and either has an action of modifying the blood or secretes a ferment destructive of glucose, as its extirpation is followed by glycosuria and azoturia. Of Darwin, the hypothesis for the provisional explanation of such facts as the inheritance by offspring of both original and newly acquired characters of parents, the appearance of characters belonging to remote ancestors (atavism), and the appearance in metembyronic or even adult life of characters before latent. The hypothesis depends on the assumption that every living cell of the organism at all periods of development throws off gemmules or molecules capable of reproduction. These circulate through the system and become aggregated at more or less definite points, and can give rise to a new individual, as by the buds of plants or by the combined action of distinct sexual elements. In each case the gemmules give rise to cells corresponding to those from which they originated in the parent body. Generally the gemmules develop in the following generation; but they may be permanently lost or may remain quiescent and develop after several generations. [J.]

The Papaver of Adanson are names of plants some of the genera of which are now referred to the Papaveraceae and some to other orders. The Papaveraceae (Fr., papavéracées; Ger., Papaveraceen) are the poppyworts, an order of polyetalous, dicotyledonous herbs, rarely shrubs, with a milky or colored, often narcotic juice, distinguished especially by the presence of abundant fleshy and oily albumen, that constitutes the only absolute difference, according to Baillon, between their reproductive organs and those of cruciferous plants. Bentham and Hooker place them in the cohort parietales, and divide them into the Papavereae (see below) and Fumariaceae (made a distinct order by some botanists). The Papavereae (Fr., papavérées) are: Of Sprengel and others, the Papavereae (including the Fumariaceae); of Prantl and Kündig, a tribe of the Papaveroideae (see below); of Bentham and Hooker, a sub-order of the Papaveroideae agreeing nearly with the Papaveroideae of Prantl and Kündig. The suspension or abolition of a functional power, especially in the nervous system, in which case there is a temporary or permanent loss of the power of motion or of sensation, or of both, in the parts supplied by the affected nerves. [D.]—Acute anterior spinal p. of adults. See under Spinal p. in the adult.—Acute ascending (spinal) p. A progressive motor p.: a disease affecting men more frequently than women, and following severe exposure to cold or some infectious or febrile disease. Paresis of the legs appears first, and is followed by complete p. with muscular relaxation. Similar conditions supervene in the muscles of the pelvis, loins, abdomen, thorax, upper extremities, diaphragm, and neck. Speech is affected, and there are dyspnoea, dysphagia, and sensory disturbances. Cutaneous reflex action and muscular irritability are lost and remain lost until death or until all paralytic symptoms have disappeared. There is neither muscular atrophy nor change in electrical irritability. The cerebral functions are not usually involved. There is but little if any elevation of temperature. The disease may terminate fatally in a few days, in consequence of respiratory or cardiac p., or may continue for several months. Changes in the central or peripheral nervous systems are slight, if indeed any have been discovered. An enlargement of the spleen, the mesenteric glands, and the closed follicles of the intestines suggests a toxic origin of the disease, which was first described by Landry in 1859. [Gowers (a. 34).]—Acute atrophic spinal p. See Acute anterior POLIO-MYELITIS.—Acute progressive p. Of Harley and Clarke, acute ascending p. body which, instead of drying up, leave raw surfaces from which the vegetations spring, resembling condylomata and attended with an offensive discharge. It is regarded as identical with the herpes vegetans of Auspitz and (though not believed to be syphi-Förster's p. consists of a semi-circle of 12 in. radius, which is graduated on its inner surface in degrees and is fastened at its vertex to a vertical rod, so as to describe a hemisphere when rotated. In the centre of this sphere should be the nodal point of the eye to be examined. There is erected opposite the first rod a shorter rod, with a hollowed-out chin-rest. From this runs upward a narrow rod, bent at the end, which end stands exactly 1 in. below and 1 in. in front of the centre of the arc of the p. To this end is fitted the lower orbital margin, which should also be 1 in. below and 1 in. in front of the nodal point. From the foot of this rod, and rotating around it, runs a wire bent as a quadrant, on the end of which is a small movable ivory ball. This serves as the object of fixation, while upon the arc a small white square is shoved forward from periphery to centre as a test-object of indirect vision. By rotation around its axis the arc can be fitted to every meridian of the eye, and upon its graduated scale may be read off the most extreme point at which the p. peripheral object is still visible. It forms a closed sac except in the female, where it communicates with the exterior by means of the oviducts. Commencing above on the posterior portion of the liver, it descends upon the anterior lower surface of the diaphragm and lateral walls of the abdomen (being continuous on either side with that part which passes back to cover the posterior abdominal wall to a point slightly above the crest of the pubes, where it is reflected upon the antero-superior surface of the bladder, the fundus and posterior portion of which it covers. From this portion are given off duplicatures constituting the false ligaments of the bladder. From the bladder the p. is reflected upon the rectum or in the female upon the uterus (forming by its folds in the latter case the anterior, broad, and posterior ligaments), and thence upon the rectum. Partially covering the rectum, it passes back on each side to the pelvis, forming the mesorectum, and ascends to about the level of the third lumbar vertebra, from which it is reflected down to the small intestine, around which it turns and ascends, the two layers closely united forming the mesentery, to about the level of the pancreas, where it again descends

to the colon, which it partially envelops, forming the mesocolon. From this point it again descends and turns upon itself, forming the outer layer of the great omentum, to reach the lower margin of the stomach, the front of which it covers. From the stomach it passes to the lower surface of the liver, which it covers, forming a portion of the gastro-hepatic omentum, and then ascends upon the anterior surface to the point of beginning. Near the left posterior part of the liver the parietal p. is reflected down from the lower surface of the diaphragm to the inferior posterior surface of the liver, whence it passes to the stomach, completing the gastro-hepatic omentum. After covering the posterior surface of the stomach it descends, and after turning upon itself, forming the inner layers of the great omentum, ascends to the colon, which it covers in part, completing the mesocolon, and passes back to the posterior wall of the abdomen, up which it passes to its point of commencement. From the stomach a secondary fold passes which invests the spleen and forms the gastro-splenic ligament. Other secondary folds in this situation form the ligaments of the liver. Ger., Phosphor. A name given at first to any phosphorescent substance (see Bononian p., etc.), and also used in the sense of pyrophorus, but now applied exclusively to a non-metallic element discovered by Brand in urine. It was afterward obtained from bone-ash, and is still so prepared. Its elementary nature was first pointed out by Lavoisier in 1772. Combined with calcium, aluminum, and iron, it occurs in nature forming various minerals, and is also an important constituent of the animal and vegetable organism, where it is found combined with calcium, magnesium, sodium, ammonium, and certain organic radicles. In the animal body it occurs more especially in the bones, teeth, and nervous tissue. P. presents several allotropic modifications. Ordinary or colorless p. is a colorless or slightly yellow, wax-like, translucent body of crystalline structure, and having a garlicky odor, but no taste. At ordinary temperatures it is soft and cuts readily with a knife, but at 44°C it is brittle. It melts at 44.8°C . to a colorless or slightly yellowish liquid, which boils at 280°C , forming a colorless gas. It also sublimates in a vacuum at ordinary temperatures, and recondenses in colorless crystals. It is almost insoluble in water, and soluble with difficulty in ether and in alcohol, but dissolves readily in carbon disulphide. It is readily inflammable, and possesses the property of becoming luminous in the dark when in contact with moist air, giving off at the same time white fumes of a garlicky odor. Its sp. gr. is 1.734. Red or amorphous p. is formed from ordinary p. by the action of heat or light and also by the presence of iodine in minute quantities. It is a hard, compact, reddish-brown solid, of a metallic lustre, devoid of taste and odor. It is insoluble in carbon disulphide, oxidizes with great difficulty, is non-luminous at ordinary temperatures, and is not poisonous. Its sp. gr. is 2.106. Metallic or rhombohedral p. is a modification of p. produced by heating it highly in a sealed tube together with metallic lead. It is a dark mass of bright metallic lustre, consisting of microscopic rhombohedral crystals. In thin laminae it has a red color. Its sp. gr. is 2.34. A fourth allotropic form of p. has been described by Thénard as black p. It is produced by quickly cooling melted p.; but it has been shown to consist merely of a phosphide of mercury or some other metal. The so-called white p. formed upon ordinary p. when immersed in water, has been shown to be only ordinary p. By some, however, these are still regarded as distinct varieties. A viscous variety of p. has also been described, formed by heating p. to near its boiling point and suddenly cooling. Houston has described a liquid p. formed by boiling p. with caustic potash. It remains liquid at ordinary low temperatures (3°C), and is regarded by its discoverer as another allotropic form of p. P. combines directly with other elements to form a series of compounds called phosphides. Combined with oxygen and hydrogen, it gives rise to the various hypophosphorous, phosphorous, and phosphoric acids and their salts. Its compounds have a strong chemical analogy with those of nitrogen; and it is the starting point of a series of phosphonium derivatives closely resembling the ammonium derivatives of nitrogen. In composition, p. is either trivalent or quivalent. P. is official under this name in the U. S. Ph., Br. Ph., Ger. Ph., Belg. Ph., Netherl. Ph., Norw. Ph., Swed. Ph., Russ. Ph., Gr. Ph., Swiss Ph., and Dan. Ph. It acts as an irritant poison, but the symptoms depend upon the state in which it is taken. There are usually a burning sensation in the throat and epigastric region, a garlicky odor to the breath, nausea, and vomiting of black fluid that has a garlicky or phosphorous odor. There may be purging and luminous stools and urine. The pulse is small, the skin is cold, and there are symptoms of collapse, that occurs rapidly in cases in which convulsions appear. In chronic poisoning, there is nausea, vomiting, purging, arthralgia, hectic fever, fatty degeneration of the organs, and sometimes necrosis of bones. [Taylor (a. 34).] It has been employed in solution in oil, or in pill form, in cases of nervous debility, in cerebral or spinal paralysis, in hydrocephalus, and in osteomalacia. The dose is $\frac{1}{10}$ to $\frac{1}{2}$ of a grain. Atomic weight, 30.96; symbol, P or Ph. [B. 3, 5, 9, 10, 16, 200; B. 95 (a. 38); a. 34.]—Acidum phosphori. Phosphoric acid. PLACENTA (Lat.), n. f. Pla's(pla'k)-en'ta. From πλακοῦς, a flat cake. Fr., p. arrière-foie. Ger., Mutterkuchen, Gefäss, kuhen (1st def.), Nachgeburt (1st def.), Samenträge (4th def.). 1. The afterbirth; an organ which during fetal life, in nearly all mammals, performs the function of aerating the blood of the foetus by providing the mechanism necessary to a direct interchange of gases between the foetal and the maternal blood; consisting of a maternal portion (see Maternal p.) and a foetal portion (see Foetal p.) closely interwoven with each other, the whole organ, thus doubly constructed, being intimately connected with the internal organism by its implantation upon the interior of the uterine wall on the one hand and connected with the foetal circulation by the umbilical cord on the other. "In all mammals, so far as is yet known," says Allen Thomson, "excepting the Monotremata and marsupials, the true placental structures consist in the establishment of a close relation between finely ramified foetal blood-vessels, derived originally from the outer or mesoblastic layer of the allantois, with minutely or widely distributed blood-vessels belonging to the uterus. Both of these are, originally at least, if not throughout the whole of gestation, accompanied and supported by cellular and other constituent elements of the foetal and maternal structures to which the blood-vessels respectively belong; while the uterine glands do not appear to take any direct or important part in this combination of foetal and maternal elements." The term p. was first used by Fallopius. In China the dried human p. is used as a tonic in phthisis. [A, 45; "Proc. of the Am. Pharm. Assoc.," xxiv, p. 760 (a, 50).] 2. PLATINUM (Lat.), n. n. Plat't(plat't)'i'n-u'm(u'm). Fr., platine. Ger., Platin. A metallic element first described in 1750 by Watson and again in 1752 by Scheffer, who was the first to write of it as platina or white gold. It occurs in nature uncombined in grains, crystals, and metallic masses, and combined with other metals in various ores and minerals. It is a soft, ductile, and very malleable white metal, which is infusible at all temperatures ordinarily obtainable, but melts in the oxyhydrogen flame. It is very heavy, its sp. gr. being 21.5. Spongy P. (Fr., éponge [ou mousse] de platine; Ger., Platinchwamm) is a porous mass obtained by heating chloride of p. and ammonium. P. black (Fr., noir de platine; Ger., Platinmohr, Platinsschwartz) is very finely divided metallic p., forming a soft black powder. P. has a marked capacity for absorbing hydrogen and for condensing oxygen upon its surface, and this property is especially pronounced in the case of the two varieties just described. P. is not oxidizable by exposure to air, oxygen, or water. It is not attacked by nitric acid, but is dissolved by nitrohydrochloric acid. It is attacked by the alkalies and alkaline cyanides and by potassium nitrate. It forms with several metals alloys which are fusible at temperatures much below its own melting point. In composition it acts partly as a dyad, forming platinous salts, partly as a tetrad, forming platinic salts. Symbol, Pt; atomic weight, 198.7. [B. 3.]—Ammoniacal compounds of p. Fr., composés ammoniacaux de platine. Ger., ammoniakalische Platinverbindungen. Vinegar of lead, Goulard's extract, solution of sub-acetate of lead; made by adding 12 parts of lead oxide to an aqueous solution of 17 parts of normal lead acetate, and mixing with water up to 100 parts [U. S. Ph.]. The preparation of the Ger. Ph. is almost exactly identical in strength with that of the U. S. Ph., each containing about 25 per cent. of the mixed basic acetates of lead. In both the Ger. Ph. and the Fr. Cod. the proportion of lead acetate to lead oxide is 3 to 1, but in the preparation of the Ger. Ph. the lead is dissolved in 10 parts of water, and in that of the Fr. Cod. in 7½ parts of water. The Dan., Norw., and Swed. preparations contain 20 per cent. of the acetates. The preparations of the other pharmacopœias have essentially the same proportions as the Ger. and Fr. preparations, except that the Dutch consists of 16 parts of crude lead acetate, 9 of lead oxide, and 62 of boiling water, the Hung. and Roum. have two parts instead of 3 of lead acetate to 1 part of the oxide, and the Finn. Ph. dissolves in 16 parts of water. Some of the older pharmacopœias dissolved litharge, red lead oxide, or lead carbonate in 4 times as much vinegar. [B. Dilute solution of subacetate of lead, lead water; made by diluting the solution of subacetate of lead with water. For 1 part of the solution of subacetate of lead are used 32½ parts of water [U. S. Ph.], 61½ of water, and 0.657 part of alcohol [Br. Ph.], 49 parts of water for the lotion à l'acétate de plomb, or 45 of water and 4 of alcoholat vulnéraire for the lotion d'ate de Goulard [Fr. Cod.]. The other pharmacopœias direct as follows: with one part of the solution of subacetate of lead 30 parts [Netherl. Ph.], 24 [Gr. Ph.], and 11 of water [45 of water and 4 of alcohol [Dan. Ph., Norw. Ph., Swed. Ph.], 45 of water and 4 of dilute alcohol [Finn. Ph.], 56 of water and 1½ of alcohol [Sp. Ph.], 49 of water and 2½ of alcohol [Roum. Ph.]; or 50 parts of water [Aust. Ph., Hung. Ph.], 49 [Ger. Ph., Swiss Ph., Russ. Ph.], 32½ [Belg. Ph.] for aqueous dilutions, and 50 of water and 2½ of alcohol [Aust. Ph., Hung. Ph.], 49 of water and 1 of alcohol [Swiss Ph.], 45 of water and 4 of alcohol [Netherl. Ph.], 24 of water and 1 of alcohol [Gr. Ph.] for spirituous dilutions. But, as the strength of the undiluted solution of the subacetate of lead and of the alcohol differs in different pharmacopœias, the above-mentioned ratios are not strictly comparable with each other. ing at the apex and passing down to the base, and then often attacking the other lung in a similar way, or starting at the base of the lung and making its way to the apex." [J. Dreschfeld, "Med. Chron., Aug., 1885, p. 353.]—Croupous p.—Desquamative p. P. characterized by an increase of embryonal connective tissue in the intra-alveolar tissue and by an abundant new formation of cells and nuclei in the adventitia of the smallest arterial branches, which in different parts forms nodules or diffuse swellings. It attacks the lowermost portions of each lung. [D.]—Intermittent p. See Bilious p.—Interstitial p. A chronic form involving chiefly the pulmonary connective tissue. The fibrous exudate crowds the air spaces, and secondary contraction of the new material may lead to bronchiectasis. The disease is almost invariably secondary to a bronchitis caused by the inhalation of irritating substances, the long-continued use of alcohol, etc. By Bayle it is considered a form of phthisis, by Addison a result of unresolved p., by Wilks a peculiar hypertrophy, and by Feltz a pulmonary cirrhosis. [D. 1.]—Latent p. P. in which the ordinary physical signs are wanting; usually subacute or chronic. [D.]—Lobar p. An acute form of p. in which the seat of the inflammation is the pulmonary deposit of coagulable fibrin, which fills them and paralyzes their action. This process is very likely to begin at the root of a lung, from which it quickly spreads, involving a lobe or an entire lung, or even terminating in the involvement of both lungs. When uncomplicated by constitutional or specific disease, it runs a fixed course, with sudden and severe febrile symptoms initiated by a sharp chill, which begin to improve, in favorable cases, between the fifth and tenth days, though the inflammatory condition of the lung may still be severe. When the disease follows a typical course it passes through consecutive stages of engorgement, red and gray hepatization, and finally more or less rapid resolution, the inflammatory exudate being gradually broken down and absorbed, and the lung restored nearly or quite to its normal condition. If there is any constitutional or specific disease, this normal course is more or less modified; also there may be contamination of the blood in the course of the absorption of the exudate, and, instead of resolution and convalescence, extension of the inflammation to the other lung, pleurisy, pericarditis, or blood coagula in the heart or great vessels. The disease is very often fatal, especially among the aged, and prevails most extensively during cold weather. According to Niemeyer, the morbid process is identical with that of tracheal and laryngeal croup. [D. 1.]—N. Y. Med. Jour., Feb. 9, 1889, p. 161.]—Lobular p. 1. POSITION, n. Po'zi-'i'z-shún. Gr., θέσις. Lat., positio (from ponere, to place). Fr., p. Ger., Stellung, Lage. Syn.: situation, posture, attitude. 1. Locality; situation, absolute or relative. 2. See POSTURE. 3. See ATTITUDE. 4. In obstetrics, see P. of the fetus, also the obstetrical subheadings of this article. The words p., situation, attitude, and posture are often used without much regard to their difference of meaning. Custom sanctions our regarding them as synonymous to a certain extent, but precision in descriptive writing would be favored by assigning a distinct meaning to each term under certain circumstances. Situation is the only one of them that is always free from ambiguity, since it is never used in medicine with reference to anything else than locality. It might be used to advantage oftener than it is. It would be better, for instance, to say of a uterus or a heart forced bodily out of its natural locality that its situation, not its position, was changed—not because the use of position in this sense is without warrant, but because, technically, it may be misleading. Attitude may be said to be synonymous with both posture and position, using the latter terms in their ordinary sense, but under certain circumstances it has a special meaning of its own. (See ATTITUDE of the fetus [in Supplement]). The same may be said of posture (see POSTURE of the fetus), and it may be added that, when not speaking of the fetus, it would be well to use the term instead of position, if the intention is to denote a relation to the immediate surroundings, since position may mean either posture or situation. Position may, however, be freed from ambiguity by coupling an appropriate adjective with it; e. g., "prone position," necessarily refers to posture, and can not refer to situation.—Bregmato-cotyloid p. of the fetal head. One of Uvedale West's subdivisions of the occipito-posterior p., being that one in which the vertex is inclined toward the acetabulum of the mother.—Cadaveric p. Of von Ziemssen, that p. of the vocal bands in which, owing to paralysis of the recurrent nerve, they remain motionless and in about the same p. as in a corpse. per cent. of potassium trisulphide and one equivalent (about 35 per cent.) of potassium thiosulphate. It is prepared by heating together 1 part of sulphur and 2 parts (11 part [Belg. Ph., Netherl. Ph., Sp. Ph.]) of potassium carbonate. According to the U. S. Ph., it should answer to a test which would indicate the presence of 56 per cent. of potassium trisulphide. Pure p. sulphurata (liver of sulphur) is an amorphous substance, liver-colored when fresh, afterward of a greenish or yellowish hue, turning to a dirty green if the access of air is not prevented; it is insoluble in water, but is soluble in the aqueous in moist air, and is completely soluble in 2 parts of water. 2. A preparation made like that of the 1st def., but with crude potassium carbonate and unwashed sulphur. It consists essentially of the same constituents. If, however, the process of heating is carried too far, the thiosulphate is decomposed into potassium sulphate and potassium pentasulphide, the latter breaking up again into sulphur and potassium trisulphide. This impure liver of sulphur is, however, for the same properties as the purer variety, but is employed externally. [95.] p. vensis. See Crude potassium carbonate.—P. with lime [U. S. Ph.]. Sp., potasio, potasa [Mex. Ph.]. A metallic element discovered in 1807 by Sir Humphry Davy; a silvery metal, hard at ordinary temperatures waxy and ductile, at 0° C. brittle and breaking with a crystalline fracture. It melts at 63°-5° C. to a liquid resembling mercury in appearance; and from this liquid, when quickly cooled, the metal may be obtained in the form of octahedral crystals. It boils at a red heat, with the production of green vapor. It has a strong affinity for oxygen, abstracting this element from near all its compounds when at ordinary temperatures. It accordingly decomposes water with the liberation of hydrogen and the evolution of so much heat as to produce combustion; and on exposure to the air it tarnishes. From the formation of p. oxide. In its chemical relations it closely resembles sodium, lithium, rubidium, cesium, and ammonium. It is univalent. Atomic weight, 39; sp. gr., 0.86; symbol, K or Ka (from Kalium). CATTERY*. 2. As an n., the algebraic sum of the amount of work which may be obtained at any point from the mutual repulsion of the electricities in a system until they are at an infinite distance apart and the amount obtained from a unit quantity of positive electricity in passing from the point of electric is the same as that of the electrification of the system to which the p. is due. This energy becomes kinetic as the electricities are brought to approach one another. [a. 49.] The ability of an electrified body to do work by virtue of its electrification; hence the degree of its electrification as compared with some other body with which it is connected in the same circuit, and especially as compared with the earth. Differences in p. are the cause of electric currents; for, whenever two bodies differing in p. are connected by a conductor, a current passes from the body having the higher p. to the one having a lower p. until the p's are equalized. [B.]—Electric p. See P. (2d def.).—Static p. The difference in electric level between the earth and a body charged with static electricity. [B.]

The complex jelly-like, proteid living substance of animals and plants which, in its undifferentiated stage, is capable of nutrition, growth, movement, and reproduction. The term was introduced independently by Purkinje (1839 to 1840) and von Mohl (1844). P. usually occurs in minute, more or less distinct masses, called cells (q. v.), and, by becoming specially differentiated in structure, gives rise to a specialization of function whereby the originally homogeneous p. is capable of performing all the varied functions of the most highly organized animals and plants. In its youngest or formative period, p. is of a homogeneous structure, but very soon divides into a denser part, which assumes a granular, fibrillar, or reticular arrangement, and a semi-fluid, homogeneous matrix, the paraplasma. According to Heitzmann and Elsberg, the protoplasmic fibrils forming the reticula of neighboring cells are interconnected, so that there are no independent cells or plastids except the wandering cells and those of the blood and lymph. [J, 26, 31, 33.] 2. Of Schultze (1861) and many more recent writers, the cell-body only.
